E-Health technologies show promise in developing countries

This systematic review evaluates the use of e-health in developing countries. It has found that using e-health tools helps improve communication between institutions and patients. The e-health tools have been found to improve monitoring and detection of patients who abandon care. Specifically, personal digital assistants and mobile devices can improve data collection and quality of the information collections.